

Animal communication

Wouldn't you love to know what your cat, dog, horse or other pet really thinks; or how they feel physically or emotionally? Most animal lovers would love to know this. In fact deepening your relationship with your pet and in that way creating a strong bond would be important to animal lovers. So what to do if one cannot yet hear our animals speak and ask for help?

Debbie Caknis, animal communicator, healer and teacher, has been able to help many people develop this inherent skill. She teaches them to look at animals holistically - not only at the physical symptoms of disease, but also at the emotional and spiritual causes of illness - allowing them to return to good health and well-being. When animals are allowed to have a voice, the effects are amazing: barriers disappear, clarity is obtained and one is guided to helping ones beloved pet live longer, happier lives.

"Being able to communicate with animals is beneficial for the animals and the humans, especially when the animals have been or are about to have changes in their lives, to be relocated to a new home or country; if they are ill; have behavioural problems; to find out if they want to be euthanized due to terminal illness or injury or want to be re-integrated with their humans. We also communicate with passed-over animals, to help their humans cope with grief and guilt", says Debbie.

Through the School of Intuition & Healing, Debbie offers both introductory and advanced workshops in animal communication. The introductory course teaches the theory of animal communication and equips participants to communicate with their own animals and the animals of friends and relatives through photograph and live readings. The next introductory course will be on 3 and 4 September; the Advanced course will be on 29 and 30 October.
